Yotsuba Theory: On the Subject of Ribbons and Lies

Introduction

After reading the latest chapter (chapter 81 as of today), I realized that Yotsuba plays a monumental role in the series as a mediator. In most instances, she had a supportive hand in resolving issues between her sisters and Fuutarou. This unique role is usually reserved for level-minded individuals... Yet, Fuutarou recognized her as an irresponsible airhead the moment he first saw her in the first chapter. Looking back at the previous chapters... I surely would have expected that the other sisters fit the role more appropriately. Seeing Yotsuba have be the mediator of the group raised a flag that stood out like the tall ribbon sitting atop her head.

This made me look back on the past 80 chapters to see if I can draw out any clues of foreshadowing – and I've uncovered the bed of lies that the author has prepared since the very beginning of the series. This theory hopefully brings light to the mystery of the Bride, the Disguised Rena, and the Bell Kisser.

DISCLAIMER: This is a theory that will explore the relationship between Yotsuba and Fuutarou only. I'll try to predict scenarios based on visual and text-based clues – and I'll jump between chapters and pages to properly draw a conclusion. I love drawing out speculations for series such as this one! However, I'm also fully aware of my own inaccuracies in interpreting elements of foreshadowing and/or symbolism – so I hope you take this theory with a grain of salt. I've completed this theory to the best of my knowledge of the manga but let me know if I missed out on anything else regarding Fuutarou and Yotsuba's relationship!

SPOILER WARNING: This theory explores content from the manga from which the anime has not yet dwelled upon. This is a word of caution towards anime-only fans of the Quintessential Quintuplets series. You have been warned!
